Show Synopsis:

Especially violent or distressing scenes

The play begins in the Baghdad Zoo shortly after the 2003 U.S. invasion of Iraq. Two American Marines, Tom (Patrick Gibson) and Kev (Arinzé Kene), are standing guard at night. A Bengal Tiger (David Threlfall) in a cage begins speaking directly to the audience, describing his hunger and reflecting bitterly on how he came to be trapped in the zoo. Tom and Kev talk about the war and the strange assignment of guarding zoo animals. Tom shows Kev a gold pistol which previously belonged to Saddam Hussein's son Uday Hussein and which he took in the raid of his mansion. Tom describes how everything in the mansion was made of gold, even the toilet seat, which he has buried in a hidden location to make him rich once the war is over. The two speak crudely about their desire for sex and violence. When Tom tries to taunt the Tiger through the bars, the starving Tiger bites off Tom's hand. Kev immediately shoots and kills the Tiger. After the Tiger dies, he continues to exist as a ghost, reflecting on how sad his life has been.

In the next scene, we meet Musa (Ammar Haj Ahmad), an Iraqi translator who is working for Kev. Kev is rude and demeaning to Musa, using racist language to try and make himself seem more in control. We find out that Tom is alive and recovering in America. Kev shows Musa the golden gun and tells Tom's story of killing Saddam Hussein's sons at their mansion as if it is his own. This story gets a strong reaction from Musa, which alarms Kev, causing him to reveal he is completely out of his depth with the war.

Scene 3 opens with Kev raiding an Iraqi home and Musa attending to translate. Dialogue in this scene is in both Arabic and English. Kev is violent and erratic. Halfway through, the Tiger enters. Only Kev can see him, plagued by guilt from his only killing in the war. Kev strips off his clothes, threatening to take on the Tiger, and then collapses crying. Musa takes the golden gun and leaves Kev on the ground weeping and apologising.

In scene 4, the Tiger delivers a philosophical monologue about the cruelty of humans and his confusion about why he is still here as a ghost. He suggests the pointlessness of believing in God in the face of such mindless violence.

In scene 5, Kev and Tom have re-united in hospital. Tom, who has returned to Iraq with a bionic hand, asks Kev why he's in hospital, and Kev tells him he was jumped during a night raid. Tom then asks Kev what he's done with the gold gun. Kev points out he saved Tom's life so should get to keep the gun, but Tom argues he will need it now that he is missing a hand and won't be able to work when he returns to America. Kev then tells Tom he has been seeing the Tiger's ghost and begs Tom for help. Tom callously tells Kev he has lost his mind and leaves after telling Kev he will kill him if he doesn't get the gun back. Kev, wracked with guilt, begs the Tiger to leave him alone, while the Tiger, similarly guiltily, is attempting to atone for his previous killings, thinking they are what is keeping him on earth as a ghost. Eventually, overwhelmed by guilt and fear, Kev kills himself by cutting off his own hand.

Scene 6 shifts to Musa in his home with the golden gun. He is visited by the ghost of Uday Hussein (Sayyid Aki). Uday mocks and violently threatens Musa, who was previously his gardener and topiary artist. He describes in detail how he has brutally tortured people and sexually abused women throughout the war. He calls Musa a traitor for helping the Americans. We find out that Uday and his brother tortured and murdered Musa's sister, and Musa is wracked with guilt about this as he was the one who brought his sister to Uday's garden. After telling Musa the Americans will soon leave Baghdad and Musa with nothing, Uday leaves Musa alone on stage.

Interval

Act 2 begins with a monologue from the Tiger about his confusion at the violence in the aftermath of the war which he is witnessing around him.

The next scene shows Tom, with an increasingly deteriorating mental state. He is trying to pay a young Iraqi woman (Sofia Asir) to sexually pleasure him as he no longer can due to his bionic hand. Tom is also hallucinating Kev's ghost due to his guilt over Kev's suicide. Kev gives a gruesome description of the process of cutting off his hand and thanks Tom for being a true friend to him. Musa, who arrives to translate, is reminded of his sister by the woman. The woman asks various questions of Tom such as how he lost his hand, and Tom says it happened in battle. In a surreal scene, Tom freezes and the young woman becomes Musa's sister Hadia. She asks Musa to take her to the garden he works in so she can see the topiary animals.

The scene resumes, and the woman leaves with her money upon completing her task. A conversation between Tom, Kev and the Tiger follows. All these characters are haunting one another through guilt in some way.

Musa confronts Tom, telling him the woman was too young and he knows Tom did not lose his hand in battle, but rather it was eaten by a tiger. Tom finds out that Musa knew Kev, and asks if he knows what happened to the golden gun. Musa reveals he has the gun, and bargains with Tom to give it to him in exchange for weapons he can sell to provide for himself after the Americans leave Iraq.

In scene 9, Kev and the Tiger are having a philosophical conversation about God in the desert. The Tiger has given up and decided he is the only God. Musa and Tom enter. Tom has told Musa they are here for the weapons Tom has promised Musa, but really Tom is looking for the gold toilet seat he left here. They ask a leper woman (Hala Omran) if she has seen Tom's bag, and she says there is nothing there. Tom becomes furious, revealing that he has lied to Musa and they are really there to find the looted toilet seat. Musa takes out the golden gun and shoots Tom. Musa leaves Tom in the desert, dying. He hallucinates Kev, who brings him the toilet seat he was so desperate to find. Kev translates between him and the leper woman, who gives Tom water and sits with him as he dies.

In the final scene, Musa and Uday's ghost are in the topiary garden Musa used to care for. Uday says he is proud of Musa for killing Tom, but Musa feels guilt, insisting he is not the same kind of person as Uday. He thinks about shooting himself as Hadia enters and Uday once again takes her away to torture and kill her. However, Musa insists that he will live with guilt and continue to create. He has a conversation with the Tiger, who is still looking for God and meaning. Musa states that God's only statement to mankind is "this world".
